

JOHN PIPER'S DIMINISHED DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION AND ASSURANCE

PHILIP F. CONGDON

*Pastor
New Braunfels Bible Church
New Braunfels, TX*

I. INTRODUCTION

John Piper has a desire to please God and a passion for world missions. His twin passions come across in his writing and speaking and gain him a large following. None of the discussion which follows is intended to impugn Piper's heart for God, or his pursuit of truth. Indeed, this paper is a direct result of the latter.

In his Crossway Lecture at the 2008 ETS Conference in Providence, Rhode Island, Piper began by recalling a conversation he had with Wayne Grudem several years ago. He said Grudem told him he should come to ETS more often because he was surrounded at his church by people who largely agreed with him, and might not challenge him in the way he would be challenged at ETS. People at ETS were more critical, and Piper would be helped to avoid error and refine his thinking.

To his credit, Piper took that advice. In fact, he started his 2008 ETS address with these words: "So here I am [again], and I am looking for criticism—or at least penetrating questions that will help me avoid error and sharpen my biblical thinking."¹ Sharing Piper's desire to avoid error, I present these thoughts.

¹John Piper, "Why God Is Not a Megalomaniac in Demanding to Be Worshipped," ETS lecture, November 20, 2008, Providence, Rhode Island. Text available online in the Resource Library at <http://www.desiringgod.org/>.

A year earlier, in November, 2007, Piper delivered the Crossway Lecture at the ETS Conference in San Diego, entitled “Justification and the Diminishing Work of Christ.”² His thesis was that some contemporary teaching on the doctrine of justification “diminishes” the grandeur and wonder of the finished work of Christ. In particular, he pointed to the idea that the imputation of Christ’s righteousness is merely positionally true. In his view those who do not hold to his view that the imputation of Christ’s righteousness is both positional and experiential (in the sense that God guarantees that He will transform the behavior of a justified person into that of experiential righteousness) “diminish the work of Christ” on the cross, inhibit the normal pattern of spiritual growth in the Christian life, and open themselves up to bondage to sin.

At the outset, it is perhaps self-serving, but nevertheless appropriate, to state as clearly as I can my enthusiastic and total agreement with Piper in his passion for God’s holiness, his emphasis on missions, and his pursuit of personal holiness. I say this with conviction and seek to demonstrate it with my life, yet I differ with Piper’s view on the doctrine of justification. This is important, as an underlying theme throughout Piper’s presentation is that those who do not interpret the doctrine of justification as he does do not share this passion for missions, do not go on to godliness, and do not pursue holiness. For example, the fact that 20 families from his church had committed to foreign missions was used as anecdotal evidence that his theology was the one which produces such results. But similar results could be shown from groups with very different theology.

²Quotations inserted throughout this paper are taken from John Piper’s 2007 Crossway Lecture at the 59th Annual Meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society, November 14-16, 2007, in San Diego, CA. Written copy online at http://www.desiringgod.org/ResourceLibrary/ConferenceMessages/ByDate/2007/2489_Justification_and_the_Diminishing_Work_of_Christ/, or CD copy available from ACTS Conference Products, 11139 South Towne Square Ste. F, St. Louis, MO 63123, online at www.actsconferenceproducts.com.

The implication in too much of our invective today is, “Follow my theology and you’ll experience spiritual victory, have a passion for the lost, and your church will grow! Disagree with me, and you’ll struggle with sin, you won’t have passion for the lost, and even if your church grows, you’re just tickling people’s ears with what they want to hear, instead of giving them the tough teaching of Scripture.” This straw man is both arbitrary and demonstrably false.

Similarly, people from all sides of the argument over aspects of the doctrine of justification have a high view of the work of Christ. One who does not share Piper’s viewpoint on the “imputation of Christ’s righteousness” does not automatically have a diminished view of the work of Christ. Neither does it follow that a person who shares Piper’s theology will always magnify the work of Christ by having a passion for souls and a commitment to missions.

Indeed, we may all “diminish” the splendor of the work of Christ, regardless of our theology, in many ways. Struggles with sin are not unique to those holding any particular view of justification. Piper’s own admission of his ongoing struggle with sin is evidence of this fact.³ People with differing interpretations of biblical teaching on the doctrine of justification are inclined at times to exhibit a lack a passion for the lost, a failure to witness consistently for Jesus Christ, or struggle with bondage to sin. In short, we might say that sin is an “equal opportunity disease” that afflicts all mankind, and affects all ³In response to a question about our imperfectness in this life, Piper responded: “I know people, and I would say this about myself, for whom the greatest threat to my perseverance and my ultimate salvation is the slowness of my sanctification. It’s not theoretical questions like ‘Did He rise from the dead?’ or the problem of evil. I’ve got answers. But why I sin against my wife the same at age 62 that I did at age 42 causes me sometimes to doubt my salvation or the power of the Holy Spirit...This question is not theoretical.” John Piper, “Why God is Not a Megalomaniac in Demanding to be Worshipped” 60th Annual Meeting of the Evangelical Theological Society. Recording available through ACTS Conference Products, # EV08487 (www.actsconferenceproducts.com).

Christians, regardless of their doctrine of justification. So at the outset, let us dispense with any notion that this or that theology is either the gateway to spiritual success, or the trap-door to spiritual failure.

Two basic issues do, however, come to the surface as a result of Piper's presentation. The first may be characterized as the answer to the Philippian jailor's question, "What must I do to be saved?" It is ironic that what Paul and Silas succinctly stated in response, "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved," an invitation to believe which evidently required no further explanation, and which the jailor received immediately with joy, is the object of intense division, and increasingly complex theological penumbræ in the writings of modern scholarship.⁴ It is always worth asking whether or not a person's soteriology agrees with or undermines Paul's evangelistic statement.

The second issue is an outgrowth of the first, perhaps more of a 'felt issue,' what Piper referred to in his lecture as "the subjective side of the problem, the more pastoral side—namely, the struggle for assurance." Assurance of salvation is often devalued in theological debate, but it is a crucial and deeply felt issue within the wider Christian community.⁵ I suspect that the readiness, and even eagerness, of some theologians to make statements that undermine the doctrine of assurance reflects a too cavalier attitude toward what is intrinsic to evangelical faith. I agree with Piper that this is important. How we frame our soteriology impacts the possibility of any real assurance that we are saved, and indirectly affects every aspect of our ongoing Christian walk.

⁴For a breakdown of various approaches to what is required for justification in contemporary scholarship, see Dane C. Ortlund, "Justified by Faith, Judged according to Works: Another Look at a Pauline Paradox," JETS 52/2 (June 2009), 323-39.

⁵Joel R. Beeke, The Quest for Full Assurance (Edinburgh: The Banner of Truth Trust, 1999), 279-85.

II. PIPER'S DIMINISHED DOCTRINE OF JUSTIFICATION

The question “What must I do to be saved?” has eternal ramifications. The gift of God is eternal life—that is what is at stake. Because Scripture is so succinct on this issue, it is hard for anyone laying claim to being an “Evangelical” to deny that Paul’s answer is entirely adequate: “Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved.” But it is truly spectacular to see what creative theological minds can construe within this simple statement. For example, there are those who insist that saving faith includes works! Despite explicit Biblical statements that justification is not of works (Eph 2:9), that it is received by those who “do not work, but believe” (Rom 4:5), and it is “by faith in Christ and not by the works of the Law” (Gal 2:16), they insist on making works part of the equation.

For example, John MacArthur’s writings within the “Lordship Salvation” debate often reflect an inclusion of works in the salvation formula. He writes, “Meritorious works have nothing to do with faith. But faith works have everything to do with it.”⁶ This semantic ‘slight of hand’ impregnates “faith” with anything and everything from an attitude of sorrow, to abject grief over sin, to a life of godliness, to—and this is the logical end—an absolute holiness. The inevitable result of this thinking is justification based on our works.

More recently, Paul Rainbow and Richard Gaffin show similar theological dexterity in proposing that there is an “initial justification” which is by faith alone, and a “final justification” which depends on “works of grace.”⁷ Rainbow clearly states that in his view, “good works will be the ground on which God will approve of believers on the last day.”⁸ Eternal life is gained, according to this view, by faith and good works. Karlberg’s assessment of Rainbow and Gaffin is succinct:

⁶ John MacArthur, Faith Works (Dallas: Word, 1993), 53, emphasis his.

⁷ Paul A. Rainbow, The Way of Salvation: The Role of Christian Obedience in Justification (Bletchley, UK: Paternoster, 2005); Richard B. Gaffin, Jr., “By Faith, Not by Sight:” Paul and the Order of Salvation (Bletchley, UK: Paternoster, 2006).

Whether one is reading The Way of Salvation or “By Faith, Not by Sight,” the message is the same – one that is out of step with Scripture and orthodox Protestant teaching.⁹

It is difficult to see how John Piper’s comments do not lead to the same conclusion. He states that what an unbeliever needs is “the righteousness of someone else” – that is, Christ. But instead of understanding this forensically (judicially), that is, a guilty sinner being “declared righteous” on the basis of Christ’s substitutionary atonement, he sees this as a reference to practical living. Piper is clear: Righteousness “means the way one behaves when one behaves in accord with some right standard.” In fact, he equates Christ’s perfect (practical) obedience in Philippians 2:8 with the righteousness the believer receives in Philippians 3:9.¹⁰ He states: “Christ was found in human form obedient; we are found in him righteous. Which would naturally mean that in Christ – in union with him – his perfect obedience is counted as ours as gift (sic) from God.” Note: It is not the forensic result of Christ’s perfect obedience – a believing sinner being declared righteous by God on the basis of the Son’s finished work, which we receive in justification; rather, “His (Christ’s) perfect obedience is counted as ours as [a] gift from God.”

⁸Rainbow, The Way of Salvation, 82-84.

⁹Mark W. Karlberg, review of The Way of Salvation, by Paul Rainbow, and of “By Faith Not by Sight,” by Richard Gaffin, JETS 50 (June 2007): 428..

¹⁰Piper bases this on the shared use of the passive voice of the word “find” in both verses, but the suggestion that this means our behavior as Christians will (or must) mirror the perfect behavior of Christ is at best an example of finding more in the text than the author ever put there himself, and at worst forcing his own theology on the text. The repetition of a word in two contexts does not allow us to equate the two contexts!

If we have been so made righteous, if Christ's "perfect obedience" is received as a gift at the moment of faith, then the demonstration of that obedience in our behavior immediately becomes a sine qua non of justification. Without that "perfect obedience," how can anyone lay claim to being justified? An inevitable outcome of justification, therefore, becomes a de facto requirement of it. This view was articulated and defended by John Gerstner, who wrote: "The question is not whether good works are necessary to salvation, but in what way they are necessary. As the inevitable outworking of saving faith, they are necessary for salvation."¹¹ No matter how we couch it in terms of what God is doing through us, the result is simply this: If we do the works, we are saved. If we fail to do the works, we are not saved. To affirm justification sola gratia, sola fide, solus Christus (by grace alone through faith alone in Christ alone) has no real meaning if in the next moment we declare that "perfect obedience" will demonstrate whether or not you are saved. Whatever degree of holiness (and no standard can be any higher than Christ's "perfect obedience") is viewed as an inevitable result of justification, that holy behavior becomes a requirement for justification.

That Piper's doctrine of justification includes a requirement of doing good works is borne out in his preaching and writing. Under the heading, "Eternal Life is at Stake," he says:

¹¹ John H. Gerstner, Wrongly Dividing the Word of Truth: A Critique of Dispensationalism (Brentwood, TN: Wolgemuth & Hyatt, 1991), 210 (emphasis mine). This is not a new view. Arthur Pink, in An Exposition of Hebrews (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1968, p600), quotes John Owens – the prince of Puritan expositors – with approval: "...but yet our own diligent endeavor is such an indispensable means for that end, as that without it, it will not be brought about...If we are in Christ, God hath given us the lives of our souls, and hath taken upon Himself, in His covenant, the preservation of them. But yet we may say, with reference unto the means that He hath appointed, when storms and trials arise, unless we use our diligent endeavors, we cannot be saved" (italics mine).

He [Paul] forsees the possibility that some professing believers—in the judgment of charity he calls [them] brothers, could be destroyed...

...

Works confirm that we are saved.¹²

In a message teaching that we must help fellow brothers and sisters to make it to heaven, Piper says:

In other words, I'm suggesting that the way Paul is motivating us with the death of Christ is not by drawing attention to the fact that the death of Christ secures the brother so we are not needed to get him to heaven and couldn't destroy him if we wanted to. That's not the function of the death of Christ in this argument. I'm suggesting that Paul wants us to think this way: Getting to heaven demands the use of means, and Christ has died to make these means effective for your brothers and sisters. The means include persevering in faith ("The one who endures to the end will be saved," Mark 13:13), and fighting sin ("If by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body, you will live," Rom 8:13), and being exhorted by brothers not to lapse into patterns of sin and unbelief ("exhort one another every day...that none of you may be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin," Heb 3:13).¹³

¹² John Piper, "We Will All Stand before the Judgment of God (Romans 14:10-13)"; October 30, 2005. Available at desiringGod.org.

¹³ John Piper, "Do Not Destroy the Work of God (Romans 14:14-23)," November 6, 2005. Available at desiringGod.org. At times, Piper makes conflicting statements, resulting in confusion as to where he really stands. For example, in "The Justification Debate: A Primer" (CT, July 23, 2009; see <http://www.christianitytoday.com/ct/2009/june/29.34.html>), under the heading "The Gospel", he writes: "The heart of the gospel is the good news that Christ died for our sins and was raised from the dead. What makes this good news is that Christ's death accomplished a perfect righteousness before God and suffered a perfect condemnation from God, both of which are counted as ours through faith alone, so that we have eternal life with God in the new heavens and the new earth" (italics added). Two paragraphs later, under the heading "Future Justification," he writes: "Present justification is based on the substitutionary work of Christ alone, enjoyed in union with him through faith alone. Future justification is the open confirmation and

In his famous book, Desiring God, he writes:

...These are just some of the conditions that the New Testament says we must meet in order to be saved in the fullest and final sense. We must believe in Jesus and receive him and turn from our sin and obey him and humble ourselves like little children and love him more than we love our family, our possessions, or our life. This is what it means to be converted to Christ. This alone is the way of life everlasting.¹⁴

From an Evangelical perspective, considering the historical debate between evangelicals and Rome over the role of good works as a means of justification, we might say that ‘the fox is in the henhouse.’ We have acceded to the notion that justification is not by faith alone, but by faith and works. Our theology must return to a place where we can be both intellectually honest and as concise as Paul was when he invited the Philippian jailor to “Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved.”

Any inclusion of works into the salvation formula is inimical to the biblical gospel, and could therefore be said to “diminish the work of Christ,” or to use Paul’s words, to “nullify the grace of God” (Gal 2:21).

declaration that in Christ Jesus we are perfectly blameless before God. This final judgment accords with our works. That is, the fruit of the Holy Spirit in our lives will be brought forward as the evidence and confirmation of true faith and union with Christ. Without that validating transformation, there will be no future salvation” (italics added). How it can be true that “through faith alone...we have eternal life with God in the new heavens and the new earth,” but at the same time also be true that at the “final judgment,” without the “validating transformation” of our good works, “there will be no future salvation”? Which is it—“through faith alone,” or only with “validating transformation” of our works?

¹⁴John Piper, Desiring God (Sisters, OR; Multnomah Publishers, 2003), 69-70. For an excellent response to Piper’s view of Gal 5:6 making good works part of the justification formula (and clarification on other misused biblical texts in reference to faith and works), see Fred Chay and John P. Correia, The Faith That Saves: The Nature of Faith in the New Testament (Schoettle Publishing Company, 2008), 90-101, available by request at <http://www.graceline.net/>.

III. PIPER'S DIMINISHED DOCTRINE OF ASSURANCE

This discussion leads inexorably to the question of assurance of salvation. Piper identified this issue as a major spiritual problem among his parishioners. He stated in his presentation: "I deal with this as much as anything, probably, in the people that I'm preaching to. Fears, and doubts, doubts not about objective 'Did He rise from the dead' – very few people are wrestling with that – but 'Am I in? Am I saved?' That's very common for people to wrestle with."

Piper's solution to this epidemic of a lack of assurance of salvation within his congregation is to point to the imputation of Christ's righteousness—the practical outworking of the righteousness of Christ in our daily lives. He states that ...there are deficiencies—defects—in the sinful human soul that were meant to be remedied by the achievement of the imputation of Christ's righteousness to believers. Christ did not perform this great work for nothing. There was a need for it. When that achievement is denied, that need languishes without remedy, and the assumption is made that it can be remedied by Christ's other achievements, like the forgiveness of all our sins.

This is a startling statement. Piper suggests that a believer who bases his assurance on the fact that all his sins have been forgiven will "languish" in a lack of assurance, while a person who understands the imputation of Christ's righteousness to mean that they will exhibit his "perfect righteousness" in their lives will overcome the "deficiency in the human soul" which undermines our assurance. Piper offers no Biblical or logical explanation why this would be so. Instead, he simply admonishes us, "Don't try to be wiser than God."

Since Piper views this as a major spiritual problem within his church, we may assume that he views lack of assurance of salvation as a bad thing. JOTGES readers certainly concur with this concern. But if the aim is that Christians will have assurance, it is difficult to understand how basing it on our progressive works of righteousness will produce such a goal. Indeed, Piper's own statement would suggest that his theology does not lead to a solution for the problem of a lack of assurance of salvation. Among those who listen to his teaching each week, who are in his congregation and most likely to embrace and embody his theology, it is "very common" for them to wrestle with a lack of assurance.

Beyond this, Piper himself evidently also wrestles with a lack of assurance of salvation. In response to a question in the 2008 Crossway Lecture at ETS, he said, "...why I sin against my wife the same at age sixty-two that I did at age forty-two causes me sometimes to doubt my salvation."¹⁵ Unless this was a case of hyperbole, in which Piper overstated his meaning for effect, we cannot but conclude that he himself is, because of his own moral failings, occasionally uncertain of his eternal salvation! While such comments may seem to exhibit a godly humility which reflects well on one's spiritual destiny, many will struggle to find comfort in the notion that a pastor and Christian leader of Piper's status is unsure of his eternal destiny.

The fact is, dependence on our works for assurance of salvation ultimately and inevitably undermines any real assurance. Even the best of us falls far short of "Christ's perfect obedience"! Therefore, we are all left with ever-varying levels of eternal insecurity. This kind of teaching has spread throughout evangelicalism, resulting in a pandemic of lack of assurance.¹⁶ This cannot help but “diminish” the doctrine of assurance, that “by grace alone through faith alone in Christ alone” a person is justified, possesses eternal life, and with it assurance of salvation.

¹⁵See footnote 3.

IV. A BIBLICAL-HISTORICAL CORRECTIVE TO PIPER’S DIMINISHED

A. VIEWS OF JUSTIFICATION AND ASSURANCE

Did Jesus accomplish fully the payment for sin once-for-all on the cross? Was it indeed “finished,” as He said (John 19:30)? Concerning this, Calvin writes:

Now this word, which Christ employs, well deserves our attention; for it shows that the whole accomplishment of our salvation, and all the parts of it, are contained in his death. We have already stated that his resurrection is not separated from his death, but Christ only intends to keep our faith fixed on himself alone, and not to allow it to turn aside in any direction whatever. The meaning, therefore, is, that every thing which contributes to the salvation of men is to be found in Christ, and ought not to be sought anywhere else; or – which amounts to the same thing – that the perfection of salvation is contained in him.

...

If we give our assent to this word which Christ pronounced, we ought to be satisfied with his death alone for salvation, and we are not at liberty to apply for assistance in any other quarter; for

¹⁶Gary M. Burge, The Letters of John, NIV Application Commentary (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1996), 155, writes: “I am frankly astonished at the number of times I have explained to classes of Christian college students about the unmerited love God has for us...and how in the course of my explanation students from strong evangelical churches literally will cry... they point to the insecurity they have learned at their home churches. ‘If I don’t feel like God’s child, maybe I’m not.’ ‘If I can’t always act like God’s child, perhaps I never was.’ My office has witnessed such statements from the children of our evangelical households every semester for years.”

he who was sent by the Heavenly Father to obtain for us a full acquittal, and to accomplish our redemption, knew well what belonged to his office, and did not fail in what he knew to be demanded of him. It was chiefly for the purpose of giving peace and tranquility to our consciences that he pronounced this word, It is finished. Let us stop here, therefore, if we do not choose to be deprived of the salvation which he has procured for us.

...

...Christ, having once accomplished, by a single oblation, all that was necessary to be done, declares, from the cross, that all is finished.¹⁷

Leon Morris agrees:

Jesus died with the cry of the Victor on His lips. This is not the moan of the defeated, nor the sigh of patient resignation. It is the triumphant recognition that He has now fully accomplished the work that He came to do.¹⁸

Tenney echoes:

The use of the perfect tense in "It is finished" (tetelestai) signifies full completion of Jesus' work and the establishment of a basis for faith. Nothing further needed to be done.¹⁹

¹⁷ John Calvin, Commentary on the Gospel According to John, trans. William Pringle, vol. 2, Calvin's Commentaries (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1848; repr., Grand Rapids: Baker Books, 2003), 235, 236, 237.

¹⁸ Leon Morris, The Gospel According to John (NICNT) (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971), 815, italics mine.

¹⁹ Merrill C. Tenney, The Gospel of John, (EBC), Frank E. Gaebelain, Gen. Ed. (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1981), 9:184, italics mine.

And Gaebelein writes:

But who can tell what this one word “It is finished” means? It is as glorious as it is inexhaustible and unsearchable. Never before and never after was spoken such a marvelous word, which means so much. No Saint is able to measure the depths of this triumphant shout. It means that His great sacrificial work, the sin-bearing, was now finished. All that needed to be done to satisfy the righteousness of God and to vindicate His holiness was finished; peace was now made in the blood of His cross; all that God in His eternal counsel had purposed was finished; prophecies and types relating to His matchless atoning work were finished. Yea, all was finished to reach down to man in his deepest degradation and to save him to the uttermost, so that the lost, the guilty, the hell-deserving sinner becomes, trusting in Him, a child of God and an heir of glory. All is finished to put on the side of the believer every spiritual blessing which an infinite God is able to bestow.²⁰

To the Galatians the Apostle Paul wrote, “I do not nullify the grace of God, for if righteousness comes through the Law, then Christ died needlessly” (Gal 2:21). Concerning this Luther forcefully writes:

The Antichrist teaches that faith is no good unless it is combined with works; instead of the grace of Christ and his kingdom, he has established the doctrine of works and ceremonies.²¹

Undergirding the doctrine of assurance, the Apostle John wrote, “He who has the Son has the life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have the life. These things I have written to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, so that you may know that you have eternal life” (1 John 5:12-13).

²⁰Arno Clement Gaebelein, The Gospel of John, (Gospel Publishing House (?), 1919), 371, italics mine.

²¹Martin Luther, Galatians; The Crossway Classic Commentaries, Alister McGrath and J.I. Packer, Series Editors (Wheaton: Crossway Books, 1998), 113, italics mine.

Was this knowledge only provisional, based ultimately not on believing, but on works, so that those “who believe in the name of the Son of God” cannot really know they “have eternal life”? Such an assertion turns Scripture on its head! As Marshall affirms,

John was therefore writing not to persuade unbelievers of the truth of the Christian faith but rather to strengthen Christian believers who might be tempted to doubt the reality of their Christian experience... Those who believe in the name of Jesus *can be sure of their possession of eternal life.*²²

V. CONCLUSION

We should all be grateful to John Piper for tackling difficult issues associated with the doctrine of justification, and laying bare the difficulties both he and members of his church have experienced in the area of assurance of salvation. An objective look at Piper's view of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, understanding it as “being made righteous” (practically) instead of “being declared righteous” (forensically), leads to the conclusion that it is his own doctrine which is, to use his word, “diminishing” the work of Christ.

It is at best uncertain how Piper's inclusion of works can do anything but “diminish” historic tenets of the doctrine of justification, and fatally undermine any possibility of true assurance. Evangelism likewise is distorted to the point where it becomes very difficult for an unbeliever hearing a presentation like Piper's to grasp the promise of everlasting salvation to the one who simply believes in Jesus.

²²I. Howard Marshall, The Epistles of John, NICNT (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978), 243, italics mine.

In our desire to promote holiness, and exalt the finished work of Christ, may we never inadvertently undermine that very work, and “diminish” its completeness and grandeur.